

A LAN (Local Area Network) is the most basic form of infrastructure that allows communication between two or more computers.

A LAN can be constructed with or without servers and is typically restricted, through the limits of network equipment, by physical location. Any system that allows communication between multiple LAN is called a WAN (Wide Area Network), of which the biggest existing one is the World Wide Web, also known as the Internet.